This is especially true with grandparental genes, which are not always compared to the current state of the mother or father generations. Another side effect of using a conventional maternal and paternal hypothesis is that it can explain away observed variations. For example, conventional molecular approaches may go to great effort to exclude paternal mutations in the origin of a disease. However, if the ultimate origin of the disease is indeed from the maternal grandfather, then the disease may be attributed to a problem with mitochondrial DNA. This "ghost" of a paternal mutation will of course be invisible to any methods which fail to distinguish between maternal and paternal effects. Finally, an important point must be made here. You do not "test" a man for 9M because, for most of us, in our experience, the father of the child is likely to be the original person who made the decision to have a child, but that decision was probably to form a relationship with another woman. I do not think we can ever know whether or not this decision was a conscious process of (in retrospect) making a choice about what kind of relationship you wanted to form with the child. In fact, in most cases, when we identify a man to be the 9M we know very little about his motives, behaviour, or view of the world. These are admittedly difficult situations for the conventional molecular approach to explain. But, as the author of this piece of work admits, it is up to the individual to decide the most appropriate avenue of investigation. Either you decide to keep an open mind and consider the 9M approach to be more of a hypothesis, or decide the 9M is nothing more than a
