Hypertrophy of the tunica media of the arterial wall is a major component of arterial hypertrophy. The mechanisms by which smooth muscle cells (SMCs) of the tunica media replace those of the intima are unclear. We have developed a model of tunica media hyperplasia of isolated rat aorta. A single injection of 17 beta-estradiol evoked striking hyperplasia of the tunica media of the distal two thirds of the aorta, with an accompanying decrease in the size of the intima. A 30% increase in media SMCs, which were identified by an antibody to alpha-actin, was accompanied by a small increase in the ratio of actin to alpha-actin in the media. Because smooth muscle alpha-actin is a specific marker for differentiated smooth muscle cells, these results suggest that SMC hyperplasia in the tunica media of the arterial wall may be due to an increase in the number of SMCs with the potential for producing alpha-actin. The increased density of alpha-actin-containing SMCs that we observed may be related to the high rates of both cell division and apoptosis in the endothelium and adventitia. In vitro, aortic SMCs that had migrated from the media to the intima were readily induced to express alpha-actin. Thus, the presence of SMCs with the potential for producing alpha-actin in the tunica media of the arterial wall suggests that tunica media hyperplasia in the arterial wall may occur without the growth of endothelial cells and without neo-intimal formation.1.
