I'm writing a plugin for an IDE and I need to get a name of the constructor, which I can not find directly. There are several constructors in this class: // src/main/java/com/x/x/X.java package com.x; import com.y.Z; public class X extends Z { public X() { this("someString"); } public X(String someString) { } } A: The simple solution is to use reflection, and call the constructor, however it will not provide the name of the constructor (rather the full class name). public class X { public static void main(String[] args) { Constructor ctor = X.class.getDeclaredConstructor(); System.out.println("Name: " + ctor.getName()); X x = ctor.newInstance(); } } This should output: Name: X$1 The name I see is the Java class name, actually $1, since it seems that all the (non-static) class constructors, and the default constructor, are added to the class with that kind of name. If you want to access the constructor directly in the class, it depends on the language you're using. import fl 1cdb36666d
