Is it allowed to use iron and vinegar as an improvised catalyst? I tried to look it up on google, but only got results for reactions in high pressure. A: Yes, it is entirely allowed. For most reactions it is trivial to start with an acid and an alkali. For the reaction of sulfuric acid and sodium metal to form sodium sulfate, for instance, you could just take some sulfuric acid and some soda. Things get a little more complicated when the metal is not easily accessible, such as a salt or an impurity. For example, trying to make a solution of zinc and lithium with sulfuric acid and sodium hydroxide isn't going to work as these elements aren't in their most stable form as in table salt. Instead, you need to break the salt apart to use both elements. One of the first steps in making a solution is to dissolve. For sodium chloride, for instance, we can simply heat it until the salt breaks apart into sodium and chloride, which have lower melting points and are easier to work with. This is often the first step used in "enriched sodium hydroxide", where the sodium hydroxide solution contains a higher concentration of sodium than normal sodium hydroxide. The process is often just as simple for most of the elements. Sodium can be dissolved in hydrochloric acid, for instance, and a number of elements are soluble in sulfuric acid (including lead, arsenic, etc.). After mixing, the catalyst can be taken out, purified if necessary, and reused for subsequent reactions.
