The cryptocurrency trading platform Coinbase is set to announce on Tuesday that it has acquired the U.S. exchange startup GDAX. The company posted the announced acquisition to its blog Tuesday, stating that it paid in stock for GDAX, whose funding Coinbase received from the company that co-founded the firm - Y Combinator, the seed-stage investment company. The deal received a nod of approval from Coinbase founder and CEO Brian Armstrong, who stated on his blog that he's excited to add GDAX to the Coinbase family, and that the acquisition will help the company offer institutional-grade services such as margin trading for the crypto world. He added that Coinbase will continue to invest "substantially" in its technology and engineering teams. Coinbase now gets online banking-like experience for a cryptocurrency trading platform Per the announcement, the deal includes a $100 million SAFT, which Coinbase's Marc Andreessen proposed an idea for back in May. He stated, "It should permit a wide variety of institutional investors to buy and sell bitcoin with discounted prices they would otherwise pay if they used traditional exchanges such as NASDAQ or NYSE." This acquisition will bring the Coinbase platform up to par with its peers, such as eToro and Robinhood, which have also been acquired, in the asset management market. Both of these firms currently offer virtual asset exchanges for clients to purchase and sell cryptocurrencies in the form of digital assets. GDAX currently offers crypto trading, margin trading, and a wallet platform to house Ethereum (ETH), Bitcoin (BTC), XRP, Litecoin (LTC), and Bitcoin cash (BCH). For its part, Coinbase previously acquired an enterprise blockchain firm - from Consensys - to help with custody solutions.i p F R
