Scenery: RFScenerybuilding' Standard 2016/FSXLSTM Model for Data Generation in Rapid Prototyping Efficiently creating synthetic datasets (e.g. from a corpus) is an important capability for rapid prototyping. LSTMs are capable of generating novel samples in a factorized way which can be applied to text and sound synthesis tasks. When training an LSTM model for generation, the training set is defined by an adjacency matrix that defines relationships between seed examples and the generated samples. This is implemented by cloning identical samples (the seed examples) to get multiple variations. It is important that the seed examples are identified as they can bias the generated samples. We present a technique that combines the power of data cloning and LSTM with an auto-regressive model to make an efficient mapping from an input seed example and generate multiple variations. The key observation is that as a word vector is sequentially updated for each LSTM iteration, it generates a sequence of subsequent words. Therefore, if a seed example is cloned, the resulting variations sequentially group samples related to the seed example.These days online availability of movies has enhanced the display of films from the 90's and 2000's. They display the classic fare on a 1080p screen. There are other reasons that make the old movies less appealing to watch, for example, greater vagueness and lack of taste as a result of people being able to do anything via technology. With the arrival of the Blu-Ray version of the film, everything is smoother and provides far better results. Although it was not always the case, films received significantly better treatment in recent years. When we think about watching old movies, we come across situations where people aren't aware that the situation in the film is not quite right. This is mostly in the thrillers or comedies of the 90's. In some instances, the results are so entertaining or comical that people just love to relive these moments. As new studies came up, it is clear that people enjoy watching classic films more than those that
