Features: This is a special episode of GameRevolution TV as we take a look at Game "Reproduction Man", a seemingly simple puzzle game that quickly turned into something a bit more. We'll be talking about the game's development, how it was created and put together, and the inspiration for the game. But most of all, we'll be seeing how the game itself plays and helps us to explain a little bit about how that simple idea is translated into the game itself. Maybe it's actually too simple in a lot of ways. Maybe it's just a harmless little distraction. You'll be able to decide for yourself after seeing the game. We begin our look at "Reproduction Man" with the very first version of the game. Yes, this video was shot back in September of 2005. It was just a few screenshots and a very basic description on the publisher's page. It showed four images of a thin man (not drawn to scale, mind you) to help you better understand what the game was about. Basically, you had to direct the path of his tiny sperm. (Embedded below) A trailer for the game showed the style of gameplay. It was a 2D puzzle game that sought to replicate the actual process of reproduction. (Embedded below) So you can understand the aim of the game better, we at least had to explain a bit of the anatomy involved.

and Syrian Army Re-Encounter in Palmyra Syrian regime strongholds in the capital of the central Homs governate Palmyra have come under serious sporadic attacks from rebels after remaining quiet for months. These attacks started in the early hours of April 2, and resumed after heavy fighting in the city of Homs. In the following days, the Syrian armed forces have managed to hold ground in the suburbs of Palmyra, launching sporadic counterattacks in the area. Two days after the last fighting, state media has stopped reporting on military operations in Palmyra, raising fears that the buffer zone has collapsed. Since the beginning of the armed conflict in Syria the Assad regime has never left its strongholds in the capital of Homs governate. However, for the first time since March 28th, the Syrian conflict has returned to Palmyra as the area's inhabitants are living in fear of attacks. The city of Palmyra sits on an important geological plateau in the middle of Homs governorate. The plateau rises to a height of 4.6 kilometers above sea level and has strategic significance in terms of military operations because of its location, surrounded by mountains on three sides. It is the isthmus connecting the capital of Homs governate with the Syrian capital Damascus. Because of the location, it is a natural place for border guard bases and checkpoints. The capital of Homs governate is located in a valley. Its location has allowed the city to survive even after the fall of Aleppo, once the most populous city in Syria. This map shows the regime's last stronghold in Homs governate - the capital of Palmyra. The city of Palmyra sits on an important geological plateau in the middle of Homs governate.
