Despite the high prevalence of a periodontal breakdown among older adults, awareness regarding appropriate preventive measures and effective screening and monitoring systems is low. However, in recent years, scientific research has suggested innovative and improved methods to both identify and treat early signs of periodontal breakdown. Genetic and molecular tools have allowed doctors to develop new diagnostic methods that can identify periodontal breakdown before it occurs. Once the transition from healthy periodontal tissues to abnormal ones occurs, effective treatment strategies are required to maintain the periodontal health of older adults. In recent years, treatment modalities have become available that can promote regrowth of periodontal tissues. These have allowed doctors to effectively manage periodontal diseases among older adults. With the development of new knowledge and technologies, periodontal issues can be dealt with effectively and without causing damage to the patient's oral and general health. Moreover, the economic burden of periodontal problems can be alleviated. A.K.S. conceived, designed and wrote the manuscript. H.N.A. contributed to writing the manuscript.
