Heretofore, spinners of this general type have employed a spool which is helically grooved in the inner periphery thereof such that rotation of the spool effects a rotation of the jigging lure. In these prior art constructions, the spool was rotated by means of a handle which was used to effect a retraction or separation of the jigging lures or the like. While prior art constructions have employed this general type of spool, they have not been able to provide for the effects of a balanced, free rotation of the spool which is not adversely affected by its own centrifugal forces. One attempt to provide a spinning reel construction of this type is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,976,443. In this patent a tapered spool is employed which is rotatable about a center hub which is fixed to the shaft of a handle. Two springs encircle the spool in spaced relation thereto, the springs cooperating with one another to provide a balanced operation of the spool. While the Spinning reel of U.S. Pat. No. 3,976,443 is an improvement over the prior art, it nevertheless has certain drawbacks. While the spool is angularly movable with respect to the main body of the reel, rotation of the spool does not occur due to a component thereof which is movable axially of the spool. Further, the springs which cooperate to provide a balanced, free rotation of the spool are relatively difficult to assemble. Still further, the use of the coil springs on the spool renders the same susceptible to damage.
