If Today, IBM announced the next generation of its PureSystems family of products, including the new eServer x3500 M3, the CompactFlash Express Link interface and the new eServer x3520 M3. The purpose of these new servers is to provide a new approach to the infrastructure by giving customers a way to consolidate systems and reduce their rack footprint. On top of this, the systems will feature hardware-based IBM PureFlex technology that will extend the capabilities of all the IBM PureFlex products. The x3500 M3 will be available starting in March 2008. The x3500 M3 server will offer a new combination of compute power, high performance and high density. It will be available in both 32-bit and 64-bit editions. It will include a combination of the IBM Power 3 GHz CPU and a 3.5 GHz PowerPC processor. The x3520 M3 will be available in the fall of 2008. The PureFlex technology will be comprised of a service processor and advanced technology platform that uses a variety of embedded micro-controllers to enable power control and all-digital fan control, among other things. The systems will also feature a new open architecture that was designed specifically for energy efficiency. This type of design uses two advanced low-power micro-controllers to save energy and reduce power consumption. This open architecture is created by combining the dual Power Architecture 7990 processor to the Power Architecture 7500 processor. As part of the standard-build M3 systems, the new system will include a compressed air infrastructure that is capable of delivering a high pressure of air. The new x3500 M3 system will use the new standard eSATA interface, which has the same performance as the CompactFlash Express Link but at a lower cost. The eSATA interface will be used to connect 1 GB to 2 GB of Flash Storage. The eSATA interface is compatible with the features of both 1.8 Gbps Compact Flash Express Link and 2
