A new study suggests that a lot of women who think they have low sex drive may actually be suffering from low female hormones, not just low libido. Researchers analyzed more than 25 years of data from a big federal survey of women's health and found that while many women have an occasional sex problem, the majority of them actually just have low levels of female hormones. This can vary from woman to woman; some women may have low levels of the hormone estrogen, while others have low levels of the hormone progesterone. The...Dynamic short-term social support: influence on health among working adults. Working adults experience high levels of stress and low levels of social support at work. Social support may have a positive impact on health among working adults, but inconsistent findings may be due to traditional conceptions of social support. This study describes the relationship between a new, dynamic measure of social support (Dynamic Short-Term Social Support) and stress (assessed by means of a specific measure of emotional exhaustion) and self-rated health in a working adult population. The design of this study was a cross-sectional, analytic survey of a convenience sample. The survey was completed by 326 working adults who completed a health history questionnaire. The Dynamic Short-Term Social Support and self-rated health and emotional exhaustion served as independent variables. The analytic results from multiple regression analyses indicated that Dynamic Short-Term Social Support exhibited a greater association with self-rated health than traditional measures of social support. The results suggest that Dynamic Short-Term Social Support provides a better representation of the relationships among social support, emotional exhaustion, and health. The study provides a better understanding of what constitutes appropriate support to working adults in a modern labor market. Tandem mass spectrometry of phenolic species in Biomechanical comparison of the McCulloch intramedullary nail to the non-locking interlocking nail for treatment of intertrochanteric fractures. To biomechanically compare the performance of the McCulloch intramedullary nail to the non-locking interlocking nail for treatment of intertrochanteric fractures. Randomised controlled trial. Level 1 trauma centre. A total of 40 pairs of fresh, adult human female femora from three donors with an average age of 56 ± 3 years old were used to study the performance of the intramedullary nail (IMN) and the non-locking interlocking nail (NLIN). The bone specimens were taken from the femora anterior to the attachment of the gluteus maximus muscle.

The leg bones were sawed through just proximal to the proximal end of the greater trochanter to simulate an intertrochanteric fracture. A 1-mm cadaver femur block of bone was fixed at the proximal and distal ends of the femur specimen. Specimen were tested in uniaxial compression at 50 degrees /min until failure using a servohydraulic testing machine (Hounsfield Hydraulic Testing System, Model 8801 KJM, Surrey, U.K.). The maximum load at failure, the rigidity, stiffness, area under the load-deflection curve, work to failure, Young's modulus and energy to failure were recorded. Data were analysed using paired T-tests. There was no statistically significant difference ($p > 0.05$) between the NLIN and IMN groups in the maximum load at failure (50.2 ± 12.8 N), rigidity (534.7 ± 149.7 Nmm²), area under the load-deflection curve ($23,276.1 \pm 4349.5$ Nmm), work to failure (8.42 ± 1.44 J) or energy to 6d1f23a050
