Differential effects of immunization with exogenous E-selectin on development of early and late stage murine experimental autoimmune vasculitis. Increased expression of E-selectin (ELN) by antigen-presenting cells (APC) is thought to be important for the development of systemic autoimmune diseases. To investigate the role of ELN on the development of EAE, C57BL/6 mice were immunized with MOG35-55 to induce both EAE and SAV. The course of these disease was examined after immunization with murine recombinant ELN, and another molecule, fibrinogen gamma-chain (Fb). Mice immunized with murine recombinant ELN survived a milder course of EAE, and exhibited decreased severity of SAV than mice immunized with Fb. EAE was induced by immunization with a mixture of ELN and MOG35-55 (ELN + MOG), and by immunization with anti-ELN monoclonal antibodies (mAb). Immunization with ELN delayed the development of EAE, whereas immunization with anti-ELN mAb exacerbated the disease. The anti-ELN mAb treatments also modulated development of SAV. Although SAV induced by Fb was attenuated by immunization with ELN, the attenuated SAV induced by immunization with a mixture of ELN and MOG35-55 was not affected by immunization with anti-ELN. These results suggest that ELN is a novel and unique player in the development of EAE and SAV. The two were charged with conspiracy to
