Broadly speaking, you can press the "paint" button and see what you get out of it -- or you can apply a number of special techniques called "filters" to make a piece of artwork look more like something else, more like a photo, or more like a painting. It's kind of like taking a photo or a painting of what you want to make and then using it as a template to run it off a screen. You can zoom in to see that the pixels are squares. You can zoom far out to see any details on the artwork. You can slide magnification around the screen using your mouse, or zoom in on just a part of the image by holding down the < (alt) key on your keyboard. To smooth out the image, you can use an image resizing tool like the heart icon. The flat rectangle is called "Sharpen." To make the image look more realistic, you can use a tool called < Recovery> to shoot out the dark, areas that may not have looked right in the original. You can make the image a black-and-white look, or a sepia color -- and most of the time you can fine-tune the look and coloring with a number of options. It's like having a color storyboard, much like you'd go through a photo editor to select your favorite colors. This ensures that the data from the original photographs is not lost by creating a copy while you're editing your image.
