The amygdala and facial affect recognition impairments in obsessive-compulsive disorder. Impairments in the recognition of facial affect in patients with obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD) have not received much attention in the literature. The current study aimed to measure such deficits in OCD patients relative to healthy controls (HC) and correlated these with amygdala volume. The study was conducted in a sample of 44 OCD patients and 33 HC. Functional and structural neuroimaging data were acquired using functional magnetic resonance imaging and magnetic resonance volumetry. OCD patients were impaired in their discrimination of fear facial expressions and of happy and neutral faces. Furthermore, they presented less activity in the amygdala in response to these facial affect stimuli. The OCD patients with increased amygdala volume were, compared to the patients with reduced amygdala volume, more impaired in their facial affect discrimination.

The patients with reduced amygdala volume also showed a trend for more severe OCD symptoms. These findings indicate that in OCD patients the amygdala is specifically involved in facial affect recognition and are in line with the hypothesis of a primary emotional processing deficit that might underlie the additional cognitive and behavioural symptoms.

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a transmission system, and more particularly, to a transmission system for transmitting data in the high speed wireless communication environment.
2. Discussion of the Related Art In the standard of the IEEE 802.11a and 802.11g, which are methods of high speed wireless communication within a specific band of 2.4 GHz or 5 GHz, a frame of the wireless communication standard is generally called a "MAC frame". In the MAC frame, which is a relatively long time unit in the wireless communication, data is provided with an indicating bit for distinguishing different kinds of information. Moreover, as illustrated in FIG. 1A, an MAC frame of the related art includes an MA-Data field 100, a CP field 102, an ST field 104, a guard-period 108 (GP) and a preamble field 110. Data is sent from a transmitter to a receiver. First, a symbol '0' is transmitted to the receiver to make the receiver recognize an ID of the transmitter. That is, the initial bit '0' of the MA-Data field 100 is an indicating bit for the receiver to identify the transmitter and the receiver. The receiver receives the MA-Data
