When I click on an object the page scroll to a element with the view of that object. I use an Ember observer to check when that scroll is complete, and then update the view. When the observer is called, the view is not rendered, and the click listener is not fired. view.handleClick = function(e) { this.set('scrollCompleted', true); this.view = view2; // the new view }; //when the page is scrolled, this is called App.StateObserver = Ember.Observer.extend({ scrollCompleted: function() { //The trigger is not fired.. } }); How can I make the click listener be fired when the page is scrolled? A: So, I was able to solve the problem. It was not really the best solution, but it works... App.ViewsController = Ember.ArrayController.extend({ contentController: 'items', items: function() { return this.get('controllers.items.content'); }.property('controllers.items.content'), contentChanged: function() { var win = window.open('#' + this.get('contentController').url, ' blank'); win.scrollTo(0,0); win.location = '#' + this.get('contentController').url; win.close(); this.get('controllers.content').send('scrollCompleted'); }.observes('contentController.content'), }); In the controller, we made the view's content controller property to be the controller, and the items property to be the content. Then, I declared an observer to know when the content changes, and called the "contentChanged" function. Before I use the content
