The vast majority of these systems, and particularly those used for scanning reading and printing, are based on photosensors utilizing photogate, photodiode or CCD active areas as sensing elements. The current trend is to increase the size of these active areas to cover large areas with reduced image pixels. Reducing pixel dimensions in turn allows for a shorter light path to the photosensitive surface thereby allowing smaller and lighter weight scanning systems to be produced. Further advantages of reducing the pixels are, for example, the increase in the signal-to-noise ratio and the improvement in the sensitivity of the system. One of the limiting factors for the improvement of the image quality, particularly the sharpness of the image, is the diffraction effect. It was primarily supposed to be based on giving you a bit of advice on how to beat the Empire's zerg strong. But I ended up not even making it into that. This post exists as a recommendation for strategies.

I'll write the strategy post for the skarmy a bit later. So at this point, here's what those of you who have been playing this game for some time may find interesting. This isn't rule advice, so it's not very much like a FAQ, though I reference some official rule advice and recomend certain strategies.

The Empire is a good one. They have a lot of tech and have a lot of development on machines due to the nature of their industries. They said they have a good uptime and ran a test for me and had a 99.8% uptime (in the past month, anyway). Good, good, but what is the best way for me to use it? I see that they have 2 GB of RAM. But, are there any issues running a PHP based website (such as PHPBB3) with 2 GB of RAM? A: It depends on your needs. Do you use PHPBB's template engine with more than 1 users? In that case, use the template engine, not the whole phpbb engine. If you don't use template engine, I've been using phpbb with 2gb ram for years, without problems. Best
