We have a bunch of friends that live in Florida and they are also part of our construction workforce. The problem is that they're moving to Kansas City where they have family. The problem is, they don't have the means to move here and therefore don't have anyone to help them move out. So they are stranded at a hotel in Florida. How do I help them out? A: I have heard of the Friends & Family program at MySearch.com. You can search there for "friends and family program," and if you enter their full name, it will give a list of companies that may be interested in connecting you. However, this is of limited use since the vast majority of people working with moving have a bit of cash, because moving to a new city is expensive. Normally it's cheaper to rent a truck and have someone else move you. However, if you have a few hundred dollars and maybe some friends willing to help you move, you can hire a moving truck for the two of you and move them out of state. In general it's cheaper to bring a van or U-Haul than moving truck. You can contact a moving company like Steinbrugge Movers, and they will have trucks loaded with the stuff you need to move. A: I would stay in contact with them. Instead of just saying "fly out next week", you could say "fly out in a week, but we're going to need help getting the rental truck/moving truck/moving van loaded and booked" In any event, they'll be easier to get in touch with when the time comes than when you're ducking your head in fear that they will bust out the spreadsheets sooner than they said they would. A: The main problems 1cdb36666d
