history book published in 2005 by historian Charles R. Allen. It is the first of a two volume history of Christianity in the Americas, from the time of the discovery of the Americas to the start of the Columbian Exchange. The book is meant to be different from most history books in that it includes all of the non-European peoples of the Americas in its story, and it also focuses on the creation of this new world for Christianity, rather than the defeat of the Roman Empire or other European or non-European events. It also describes the relationships that the ancient peoples had with one another, such as the first encounter between South American and Old World cultures. Reviews Geraldine Brooks reviewed the book and said, "Allen's study of the many important currents of history and culture that have swept through the continent is a distinguished contribution to scholarship and as elegant in its prose as the hewing of the rivers it describes." References Category:2005 non-fiction books Category:English-language books Category:History books about the Americas

Until Tuesday, House Republicans were grappling with the fallout from last week's dramatic government shutdown, which left low-income Americans worst off. Nearly two weeks later, their dilemma has turned into a spending bill to pay for things like the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) and child care. Or as Speaker Paul Ryan says, "border security." Yet, with Washington now preoccupied with a two-week debate over how to appropriate money for the border, it's unlikely either party will get far into a larger, multi-year debate about reforming the Supplemental Nutritional

Assistance Program, or SNAP, the $70 billion-a-year safety net program that provides food assistance to about 11 million low-income families with children. Some Republicans say
