Rar file of the serial. More Dr. Windows 8 Pro Advanced. A: Your original question said, I have a DVD burning program installed that I use for Burning DVDs. My first recommendation is that you ask your burning program whether it supports "Custom Presets." See here for how to find out how to do that. (Important note: If the burning program you're using has a Windows XP, Vista, or 7-style interface, you'll probably have to use Control Panel to check out this option. If it has an OS X interface, like Homebrew does, then it should be right there in the Preferences menu. If it's a Unix-based program and you use the "Archive Utility," then you'll have to use the utility's preferences.) Once you've identified "Custom Presets," you should be able to create a desired preset and then use that preset to burn your movies. The preset will tell the program "how" to burn the movie (and it'll tell the program which video encoder to use for the format, what to do to minimize compression artifacts, how to adjust the volume, and so on). Once you've identified the desired preset, you'll be able to use it for your movies, in the same way that you use any other preset in your disc burning program. I strongly recommend that you also use the "Make disk" menu from your burning program, rather than trying to manually write to your disk. I'm not familiar with your burning program, but it's likely that the "Make disk" menu would give you some flexibility in how you handle the various steps of the burning process. In particular, it's possible that you could use the "Make disk" menu to specify how often you want the program to write the DVD (maybe every minute, or maybe once per title), or whether you want it to automatically pause the recording for a few seconds at the end of a DVD title (and whether it should do that every time it finishes recording or just in some special cases), for example.
