This is a glitzy mess, not to be confused with the rather similar but far more enjoyable Katrina Kaif musical, Gulabo. Co-directed by Amit Mehra and co-writer of Happy New Year, Roshida Chanda (the filmmaker behind Maqbool, Body and The Walk) takes in a sci-fi concept seemingly out of the spirit of Ridley Scott's Alien and creates something all-too-similar in narrative clumsiness. Kunal Kemmu (a resourceful newcomer, one of whom is named The Walk) wakes up aboard a spaceship trapped in some kind of stasis, where he and what seems to be all of the unfortunate crew members are forced to battle to stay alive, unable to see or hear their surrounding. It's a pretty awful experience, with a terrible sense of scale and an array of cringe-inducing set pieces, most notably a scene where a group of live animals are transported into a flesh-eating, zombie-like robot, which screams like a demented cat. It makes Galaxy Quest look like a polished B-movie. Read the Time Out review. This isn't to say that the film isn't brightly conceived. The characters (there are a lot of them!) are a riot of genres and personalities, and the personalities themselves are organic and strong. Perhaps the strength of the film is in balancing all of this, keeping the comedy and the drama in a ratio that adds up to balance. Each character - and each of them is well-developed - has to be interesting and three-dimensional to stay in the film. And that doesn't just describe the good guys and the bad. The real villains of the piece are Riley's biggest heroes and mentors. Joy, a smart-mouthed social worker with a pre-employment screen shot in her pocket to prove it, is constantly helping children navigate and, more important, venting their own frustrations. Meanwhile, the movie also offers an (unintentional) window into the mind of an adult. That's particularly appropriate, since the bulk of the movie takes place when Riley is a tween, an age when adolescents need to shed their own parents, find their own identity, and start to function on their own. This balance of action and introspection, humour and poignancy is quite rare.

Where I live in the Bay Area, (Northern California) I have Comcast as my cable and internet provider. They offered me the privilege of buying the FiOS TV. I have to say that they are awesome and believe me I am excited about having the TV built and everything being put into place. The best thing about FiOS is that its so easy to set up with a phone call, no physical equipment needs to be installed. I decided to wait till the official launch date of June 10th to try and stream movies to the TV from my laptop computer. I think we can say now that we have a winner. But wait, there's more...the company is offering the chance to stream music from the FiOS music library right to the TV in a matter of seconds. Anyone can record music to their home network storage device and then stream right to the TV. I like being able to tinker with the media that I watch. But a company like FiOS for me is hands down a much better value for the money when compared to any standard cable/Internet company. I expect to see prices going down in time and hopefully then we will see lower prices on movies as well and especially music. I already streamed some music from the FiOS Music library using my Roku box, its a much better way to listen to music than on your computer or iPod. Its also good to know that if something happens to your computer or ipod it will stop streaming right away. I am pumped to see what else they will have to offer. For Inside Out, Pixar could never have known what they were creating: they didn't have the capacity to understand the minds of little kids. But what they did have was a close relationship with their audience -- both the cartoon animation and the Pixar studio that put them together -- and you could see that coming through in the film's honest, open depiction of emotion. The three main characters -- 16-year-old Joy (Kaitlin Olson), 15-year-old Sadness (Phyllis Smith) and 9-year-old Anger (Dan Dockery) -- are laid bare, and their feelings are represented in a brand new way. The premise of Inside Out is itself a long-standing Pixar trope, namely that the brain is divided into three main sections: there's the conscious mind where you process the here and now; the unconscious mind where you deal with emotions; and the memory banks which provide information to the brain about the past. The characters in the film, however, are such a brilliant bit of invention, and with them come such wonderfully moving scenes as the three kids go to their mother to try to explain their feeling of jealousy. They just need a bit of help, and that's where the bad and the good characters come in. They don't just allow the kids to ask for help, but they're also the ones to give it, and they manage to manage to do it with such big heart and understanding that the questions asked in the film are answered in the end. 5ec8ef588b
