The intent of the project is to develop an analytical method for the construction of cell populations for virtual screening against a set of chemical or biological assays. A cell population is derived from a given clone grown on a plate or other planar surface. Typically, the cells are sparsely distributed on the plate and there is no concern about cluster formation, overlap, or other cell overlap. In some cases the cells may be placed in a micro-well. In other cases, the cells may be surrounded by the wells of a flow-cell or similar capillary devices where the cells are not arrayed. Currently, a large number of these populations are derived and the resulting populations screened individually. This method is inefficient, wasteful, and results in a large number of false positives and false negatives. Alternatively, the cells may be first pooled and then screened against the assays. In such a case, the screening results are not dependent on the individual cells and the efficiency of screening is increased. This project addresses the issue of pooling cells by characterizing the distribution and relationships of the cell populations on the assay surfaces and developing accurate models of 04aeff104c
