Scoops “The life of the loggerhead sea turtle (Caretta caretta) has been one of slow but relentless decline. The conservation status of loggerheads, once among the most abundant of the world’s sea turtles, was last assessed as being of least concern in 2000. This has caused a lot of alarm among people who care about these beautiful animals. Loggerheads eat fish, shrimp and jellyfish. Migrants from the Caribbean and Central America range up the coasts of the United States and Canada to South America during the summer. Northern migrants mainly from the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean enter the Gulf of Mexico south of Cape Hatteras. Loggerhead nests are abundant in southern Florida and along the southeast United States and western Atlantic coasts. In the central and western Atlantic Ocean, loggerheads are found on continental shelf areas at depths greater than about 50 meters. On the north American continental shelf, loggerhead nesting occurs from Cape Cod (where nesting is heaviest), to the boundary between the Gulf of Mexico and the North Atlantic Subtropical Gyre.” And a reminder: “Over the past two decades, the world’s sharks have suffered the same fate as the world’s sea turtles. More than 80% of sharks and 70% of all other sea life are being killed every year. Nature’s Sea Turtle Handbook “What is a sea turtle? A sea turtle is a reptile from the class Reptilia that consists of two distinct groups—soft-shelled and hard-shelled turtles. The soft-shelled turtles include the sea turtles and the tortoises, whereas hard-shelled turtles include the freshwater turtles. Sea turtles are distinct from the land-dwelling turtles in that they have flippers instead of legs. Most of the sea turtle species have strong interlocking bones that are embedded in thick, leathery skin and the neck is well-developed. Sea turtles can be distinguished from one another on the basis of both external physical characteristics and shell size. The shells of sea turtles vary from as small as 12 cm to as large as 3 m. The largest known species of sea turtles, the loggerhead sea turtle (Caretta caretta), weighs up to 260 kg. There are seven species of sea turtles distributed over four genera.” Sea Turtle Forecast “Globally, the sea turtle population is considered stable
