Its 'Macros' and 'Button' tabs are the most important ones, as they serve as the means of generating, viewing and editing your macros, and the buttons that constitute them. The 'Macros' tab contains the macro files you want to generate, which are presented in a tree-structure and allow you to individually define the macro's parameters and functions, or edit them as you wish. As an alternative, you can manually define the title, behavior and functionality you require, or use the 'Generate' button, which will let you generate a new button that automatically has the same parameters you have specified. For advanced users, the macro can also be selected in the 'Macros' tab and edited in the 'Buttons' tab, which lets you adjust its parameters and appearance. Create or import macros When it comes to importing macros, there are two important functions to consider: 'Import', which allows you to import existing macros into your workspace, and 'Duplicate', which enables you to clone one macro to create a new one with the same parameters. When importing macros, you can choose which folder you want to import them into, while allowing you to select the types of macros you want to import, such as buttons or images. Import or copy macros You can also use KeyMacro as a tool for generating new ones, which means you can simply use it to create macros that have common functions and phrases. Calculate the effect of mating two parents and producing a hybrid population. See your calculated results. Recombination is the process of mating two or more parent individuals and producing a new hybrid offspring. This offspring is a clone of one parent or a combination of two parents. For example, a specific locus in the offspring will be inherited from one parent and the other from the other parent. Selection is the process of selecting the best individuals of a population according to a trait value or some other criteria. For example, each of the parents of a genetic experiment can have a different allele for a locus. The hybrid offspring in a given experiment has a genotype at that locus determined by the alleles of the two parents. The offspring can be ranked by some criteria, like its weight, fitness or its value for a certain trait. Those with the best genotypes can be selected and bred together to make the next generation. The output of the calculator is a table in which the different genotypes in a population are ranked by the criteria you selected.
