Easy!The present invention relates to work holders, and more particularly to work holders for tools or the like that can be attached to the rim of a wheel rim. While riding bicycles, the act of shifting gears may cause the cyclist to lean one or both feet from the pedal crank. This leaning of the feet against the pedal crank causes the cyclist's leg to bend. Eventually the cyclist may tire and stop the bicycle. In many cases the leg that was leaning against the crank during the shift, may be injured in the stopping. Moreover, stopping in this manner increases the chances that the cyclist's foot will rub against the bicycle or the ground, possibly causing other injuries. Several devices have been developed to prevent the leg from resting against the pedal crank. One device is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 4,402,721, in which a sleeve is mounted to the pedal crank. A sleeve is inserted into the sleeve to hold a pad in place. One disadvantage of this device is that the device is permanent, and cannot be easily removed or moved to a different part of the bicycle, which may be desired. Another disadvantage of this device is that the friction between the sleeve and the pad is minimal, which can cause the user's foot to slip. Another disadvantage is that a spring is used to bias the pad. If the user stops in a position that is not the desired resting position, the force of the biasing spring will tend to force the foot to the desired resting position. This biasing force can be a disadvantage. For example, if the biasing spring does not have sufficient biasing force, the pad may not provide adequate support for the leg. If the biasing spring has too much biasing force, the pad may become stuck to the pedal crank, and may not allow the leg
