Apple proposes standardizing the process of enabling and disabling Touch ID - snaky ===== coredog64 I'd wager that one of the reasons that developers have chosen not to use Touch ID in their apps is that they don't want to have to reimplement the same signing/validation process they use for the standard pin/password dialog. ~~~ jevinskie Including Touch ID would expose users' encrypted Touch ID to the app. ~~~ coredog64 I don't see a way around this. Touch ID is the same as a conventional password, so apps need to validate that in order to access encrypted data. ~~~ jevinskie How does Touch ID expose encrypted data to apps? ~~~ coredog64 By enabling Touch ID, you are revealing the fingerprint to apps which can then decrypt the data using Touch ID. ----- sabret00the I'm not sure I understand how this works, but my initial reaction is that the process has to be done in iOS (or through the command-line) because you have to activate Touch ID before you can perform any actions with it. Would that be correct? ~~~ SnacksOnAPlane The app doesn't need to be "enabled" to access the fingerprint reader. It can be used as a method to authenticate your device, just like "real" Touch ID. The process just happens to be that you have to enable Touch ID via Settings, instead of using the real Touch ID API. ~~~ sabret00the Oh, right - you're absolutely right.
