By nightfall, the 30-year-old had been brought to The Ronald MacDonald House, a hostel that caters for battered women and children, and the next day she was questioned by police. Smith had recently been granted anonymity by the Mercury, saying that to endure the pain of retelling the story of what happened to her on June 4, 2004, was more than she could bear. It was an evening she remembered well: "I've been fired five times in my life." The sixth time came in a hurry with the revolver in her hand. Smith was three months' pregnant, working for the Herald Sun, during a notorious interview with the paedophiles. "All I remember is the sound of a cab horn, three shots and a siren. The next thing I knew I was in the hospital with five bullet holes in me." In the darkness of a police interview room after months of police requests for information and media speculation, she caught sight of her life flashing before her. "It was like a card game. And the next thing I knew, I was in critical condition. You're in the deepest form of shock. You've just been hit with six bullets, right in the front of you, and you're in a hospital and it takes you longer to get your brain to catch up with the hit than it takes to realise you're in a hospital." The next couple of weeks were hellish. Smith's boyfriend was not allowed near her, and as the media circus intensified, a realisation crept over her that she would not be the only woman in town haunted by the memories of that day. The arrest of four paedophile men that shocked South Australia was the work of a reporter. The jury believed the publication of intimate details about the suspect and he spent five years in jail, but Smith refused to name the paedophile. "That's a cop-out," she said. "I was there." And she was back
