It turns out that we don't need external controllers for video, particularly when those controllers got more sophisticated. We also don't need it for light shows when a synth or audio interface can do all the work. Plus, that adapter transforms a Mac into a PC, which is never a good idea.

Features like the Content-Aware Move tool meant that people could duplicate any parts of an image, and migrate those parts to a new image. Not just people, but also smart machines could do this. Unfortunately, the algorithm went through a number of revisions, and the latest version of the original algorithm was the one that was fixed up. Elements now uses a new Content-Aware Fill (CAF) algorithm. For starters, it makes the process of removing unwanted areas from photos a snap. With Elements' Content-Aware Fill tool, you don't have to delineate the area of removal next to the actual area you're trying to remove. This means that you no longer have to identify the exact area of an element you want to remove. This new algorithm also fills in small blobs that other algorithms may not, for example, fill in large areas of color next to large neutral areas of gray.
