I feel that the interface and workflow have always been a work in progress, but it has come a long way. It feels really clean and focused without being too much of an interface overload. There still is a learning curve at the beginning, believe me. In the end, though, I understand the workflow and the toolset better than I did with the previous versions. I believe that although people still criticize Lightroom as just a software for photographers, I think that this criticism misses the mark. I really think that it is one of the best-kept secrets within the photo market. The level of control and functionality that it provides, for both the end user and the core developer, has yet to be fully grasped. I am not sure if Lightroom is still under development. Performance is fine out of the box. Editing with a Wacom tablet is a breeze. Exposure and color balance are accurate and lock onto a single point when in spot mode or on active mask. However, distorting a photo by dragging around the alpha channel in Aperture AI was a good illustration of the lack of RAW conversion when Aperture pushes edits to the RAW layer. This is a photography review site. So, in all of these images, you'll see a Wacom tablet. However, the one thing to remember is this is just a review site and not a Photography 101 site. I've tried to make sure I'm keeping things as honest and complete as possible. Thus, you won't see a review of the camera or lenses. If you have an XT2 and you'd like a critique, let me know. Just keep in mind that my experience with an iPad doesn't mean I'll like every camera or lens on the market. I'm probably the last person you'd ask about a Canon 7D for example, and I sure wouldn't ask about video or lenses. As for the tablet, I do plan on getting the 10.2-inch iPad Pro and I've been very pleased with the magic mouse. I still use an Apple Pencil which I love very much.
