In a very short time—in parallel to the retirement of 3D where we are moving closer to the 2D world—we can now combine 2D and 3D in the same frame. And by doing so, we can see the start of a new era of graphic design! If you like to batch-edit your photos, then you can take in big batches and save time. With some minor tweaking, you can also change the settings without having to recreate your photo, which is perfect if you're looking to keep in stock a range of similar photos (for example, a few studio shots of the same baby, in different poses). A new feature in works is the new Mocha render engine, which works to optimize the look of the image throughout the edit. This means that you can select a crop and an adjustment, and then view the output in real time to see what the finished image looks like. Additionally, it provides a preview of what the photo will look like straight after completing the edit without having to run the full-scale image through Photoshop. Another recent addition is the use of customisable graphics to overlay on photos. You can change the colour of the text that is annotated on your image, as well as change the overlay's opacity, help text, and even change the typeface. This can be used to individualize sitewide graphics, or as an alternative to using predefined graphics. You can also add grids to your images to make your layout easier to follow.
